The following extract from the Tribune will show how highly sensible friends of Omaha have been affected by the appointment made use of by us, placing the above words entire at the head of Nebraska to be regarded as those of Omaha.

[illegible]

It is pretty clear that the [illegible] Nebraska correspondence has [illegible] excitement and ugly feeling [illegible] a great deal more experience [illegible] than judgment should [illegible] latter, when [illegible] that Nebraska was [illegible] that day called.

It appears from [illegible] our correspondent, from the Last [illegible] when [illegible] about [illegible] Bluffs [illegible] Omaha [illegible] the spot. We are [illegible] ground and [illegible] City, there [illegible] about and could [illegible] to build it up, [illegible] for that [illegible] place,

"That it will be and [illegible] capital of Nebraska [illegible] the opinion which [illegible] ground ever since [illegible] proposal, [illegible] any one of it was established, but [illegible] who have favored [illegible] there and below [illegible] to be the proper spot."

We doubt whether right [illegible] found, on record, [illegible] That Omaha is to be the [illegible] and State of Nebraska [illegible] which has been gaining strength in the minds of the residents of that place, we have no doubt. We have just presumption enough to add to this, that "less favored places above and below do not exist". Winter Quarters, above, is a better place for a town, and for the Capitol of the Territory, than Omaha. It was chosen first, is pretty, has equally as good soil, mill privileges, and other recommendations to public favor. The same may be said of all the places west of it. We happen to live down below, and know what we talk about when we set forth the claims of this part of the country. In one sense of the word we live below, but when the merits of the country and the place are brought into comparison with Omaha City, we are no longer "below." We know of no "less favored places in law," except you go down as low as Fort Kearney, about [illegible] "Early attempts may [illegible] way of manufacturing [illegible] make [illegible] such as we [illegible] Baker of [illegible] the

...If the renovation and fertilizing of these lands. Its fibres would gradually a massive net work over the entire surface, that would bind the soil together, protect it from the sun and winds, and afford, in tillage a rich basis for agricultural operations. Neat cattle or horses would starve upon the tract of sandy soil where sheep thrive and fatten, whilst they maintain the land in constant progression in value and fertility. The continual and gentle pressure of their feet consolidates, without penetrating, the earth. The light and diffused droppings of sheep fertilize the soil when the copious excrements of larger animals destroy vegetation and rapidly deteriorate pastures by the introduction of coarse and worthless herbage. In my personal experience I have known pasture ranges occupied for dairies become, from this cause operating a few years, totally infested by hurdes, johnswort and other noxious weeds, each of little practical value. The introduction of sheep in two seasons has thoroughly subdued this rank vegetation and dotted the earth with a rich and delicate growth of nutritious clover. When the great value of sandy lands in sheep husbandry becomes understood, vast tracts of barren and desolate wastes, which are now unoccupied and deform our country, will be appropriated for sheep ranges and with the most profitable results. The immense and beneficial influence of this system—not alone on the wool-growing interest, but upon the wealth and producing capital of the nation—can scarcely be appreciated. Each class of these lands, specially adapted to sheep, may now be purchased at almost a nominal price. Sheep will nearly maintain themselves during the winter while they have access to the earth, for good opportunity of browsing, and uniformly long after other stock have demanded vigilant care and incurred heavy expense. They have been known to subsist in vigor and health an entire winter with no food or protection other than the boughs and limbs of the pine. They eat greedily, and when sufficiently nourished by the pasture eat hay mingled with ferns and bushes. A great proportion of the winter fodder of hardy sheep may consist of bean straw, mixed with the refuse of the barn. No animal known to the economy of our agriculture can be maintained with so much ease and so little expense. There is much applicable to this branch of husbandry which there is occupation of the lands I have understated, which are peculiarly adapted to sheep, I am satisfied that clean loam or clay soil is not congenial to their health. Lands of great value, from their fertility or productiveness in tillage, cannot profitably be appropriated to other purposes. Another prominent fact must be regarded in order to make of the advantages of sheep husbandry.

Horses, as they become aged, grow worthless. The [illegible] sowing can only be profitably [illegible] shambles with great [illegible] penditure; but the sheep when turned off at his maturity, is ready for market with no other expense or charge than his ordinary pasturage. The summer grazing of sheep upon appropriate lands is a trifling consideration in calculating their disbursements. One ton of hay, under ordinary circumstances will keep ten sheep through a winter in the meridian of New England. The average value of hay in that district is $8 per ton.—The incidental expenses of the ten sheep, particularly if no credit is given to their manure or fertilizing effect upon pastures, cannot exceed $2 in addition. With good management, and the use of [illegible] should uniformly produce off sheep in a vigorous state that estimate will cover all contingent loss by accident.
